Osteoporosis

What is Osteoporosis?

Osteoporosis is a condition that affects the bones. Its name comes from Latin for "porous bones." The inside of a healthy bone has small spaces, like a honeycomb.

Osteoporosis increases the size of these spaces, causing the bone to lose strength and density. In addition, the outside of the bone grows weaker and thinner. Osteoporosis can occur in people of any age, but it's more common in older adults, especially women.

People with osteoporosis are at a high risk of fractures, or bone breaks, while doing routine activities such as standing or walking. The most commonly affected bones are the ribs, hips, and the bones in the wrists and spine.

Osteoporosis Symptoms

The early stages of osteoporosis don't cause any symptoms or warning signs. In most cases, people with osteoporosis don't know they have the condition until they have a fracture.

If symptoms do appear, some of the earlier ones may include:

- receding gums
- weakened grip strength
- weak and brittle nails

If you don't have symptoms but have a family history of osteoporosis, talking to your doctor can help you assess your risk.

Heartburn: Causes and Symptoms

Heartburn is a burning sensation that feels like it's in your heart but isn't really. It's in your esophagus, the swallowing tube that runs alongside your heart.

The feeling is caused by acid refluxing up from your stomach. It's treatable.
